According to Fernald's account, the mines were filled with vast quantities of gold and silver, the remnants of a Spanish expedition that had been massacred by Apache Indians centuries earlier. Fernald spent years searching for the mines, but he never revealed their exact location to anyone. Instead, he kept the secret to himself, tantalizing treasure hunters with tales of his incredible discovery.

The Search for Fernald's Treasure

After Fernald's death in 1951, the search for his buried treasure intensified. Dozens of treasure hunters descended upon the Superstition Mountains, hoping to strike it rich by following the clues he had left behind. However, despite numerous expeditions and years of searching, no trace of Fernald's mines has ever been found.

Some skeptics believe that Fernald's story was nothing more than a hoax, designed to lure gullible treasure hunters into the dangerous Superstition Mountains. Others believe that he did indeed discover a hidden treasure, but that its location has been lost to time.

The Lost Dutchman's Mine

One of the most persistent legends associated with Alvin Fernald is the Lost Dutchman's Mine. According to folklore, the Lost Dutchman's Mine was a rich gold mine discovered by a German immigrant named Jacob Waltz in the 1860s. Waltz reportedly told his secret to a Mormon farmer named Jacob Weiser, but before he could reveal the location of the mine, he was killed by Apaches.

Weiser spent the rest of his life searching for the Lost Dutchman's Mine, but he never found it. The legend of the Lost Dutchman's Mine has continued to live on, and many believe that Fernald's buried treasure is one and the same as the Lost Dutchman's Mine.

Evidence and Controversy

Despite the lack of physical evidence to support Fernald's claims, there are a number of tantalizing clues that have kept the search for his buried treasure alive. One such clue is a series of cryptic maps that Fernald allegedly drew before his death. These maps, which have been analyzed by numerous treasure hunters, provide vague directions to a location in the Superstition Mountains.

Another clue is the discovery of a number of old mining tools and artifacts in the Superstition Mountains. These artifacts suggest that someone may have been working a mine in the area at some point in the past. However, it is unclear whether these artifacts are related to Fernald's supposed treasure or to some other mining operation.

Whether or not Alvin Fernald's buried treasure actually existed, his legend has had a lasting impact on the culture of the American West. The search for his hidden fortune has inspired countless treasure hunters, and his enigmatic story has become a part of the folklore of the Superstition Mountains.

Today, the Alvin Fernald Foundation, a non-profit organization, continues to search for Fernald's buried treasure. The foundation's mission is to preserve the history of the Superstition Mountains and to encourage responsible and ethical treasure hunting practices.
